

This study studies the factors that determine the amount and types of resources that are used to find and recover missing persons. In particular, this study examines how factors like media coverage and the characteristics of missing persons impact the manner in which resources are devoted to finding them. The study will also expand on actions agencies can take to find missing persons, including asking the community for help identifying possible suspects, entering the missing person into the NCIC, and asking questions regarding missing persons.